The President's Corner

Happy New Year from everyone on your OANY board. I hope that everyone enjoyed their holidays. So now it's back to work at OANY so that we can continue to bring you lots of new and exciting offerings for the New Year. We are already working on another 4 credit Sunday continuing education seminar and brunch. We are working on getting new speakers and sponsors for the coming months. Our new venue at Mario's seems to be working out well. The food has been good, the choices are varied and everyone seems to be enjoying themselves at the meetings. I think that the only thing that could be better would be the parking situation. I realize that last month was difficult for some of you but I'm hoping that things will be better in the coming months since we won't be dealing with the traffic of the holidays.

"Ask any sales reps that come into your office if they would be interested in doing something for OANY"

December brought us a great speaker, and I would like to thank Andrew Bruce for traveling so far to bring us a most enjoyable lecture. I'm hoping we can have him return to us at a later date. We are always looking for new and different sponsors and speakers. With this in mind, please don't hesitate to ask any sales reps that

The Beat Goes On

By The Old Geezer (AKA Peter Bacotti)

A thought provoking question on prism and do you know what a nasal cut is and what you would use it for?

Another month, another article, ho, ho, ho it is off to work we go. I figure I can still come up with some of the things I have learned over the years and might elicit some positive reactions. Alternatively, maybe not, maybe someone will come up with a better idea that is easier to boot. I can only say I never stop learning, that is what keeps us (me) going. I would love to learn something new every day so as to be able to pass it along to all my fellow opticians. The problem is I have to do this fast, if I do not write it down before I forget I cannot pass it on, old age has arrived.

Anyway, a good way to get into the nitty gritty might be to address something I have always wondered about. This being how to fabricate and fit a pair of glasses that had prisms prescribed not knowing how the prism was determined during the exam. Not knowing if the new glasses were going to work the way the doctor refracted the patient. Let me give you an example. The patient has a monocular PD of OD 30, OS 34 for distance. The left eye has a phoria and also has a displaced pupil superiorly of 2.5 millimeters and that is how the glasses were made. The patient exhibited signs of some vision doubling and went back to the doctor. The question in my mind is did the doctor then check for prism with the new glasses in place or use a phoropter to prescribe necessary prisms without checking with PD and superior pupil displacement.

The outcome was from the patient's point of view, better, but not perfect. The doctor says the prisms are necessary as written but neutralizing the lenses shows a different amount of prism from what the prescription called for and segment heights were different. What do you the master optician think. Please let us know.

On another front, let us think about this. What do you do if a patient loves the style and color of frames to purchase for her new glasses, but we know the bridge does not fit properly? A case in point, the patient's nose is quite large at the base. The zyl frame picked for the new lenses does not accommodate the necessary fit, what should we do? There are two possible solutions I came up with assuming you will use that frame or a combination of them both. Does anyone remember or know what a nasal cut is? Step one in this scenario is the nasal cut. When edging the lenses you make them larger than the frame by an amount about double the size of the hand beveling to flatten the nasal area of the lenses. Then you heat the frame in the area of the nasal cut to accept the new shape of the lens. What is nice is that you can control how much you can change the amount of nasal cut.

The second idea I found that works in slight adjustments is to create more cut out for the nose contour. On a zyl frame with added or old styles nose pads, you just heat the pads and curve the pads back towards the frame front to create more room. The newer types of pads require you to heat the whole pad and frame area and round the whole area without twisting the frame eye rim thus widening the nasal opening. As I have said many times, I am sure that there are other ways to handle any type of problems. It is up to you as a master optician to put on the thinking cap to explore new paths and then pass on your knowledge to others in the profession. I still know one of the best ways is to attend local Opticians Alliance of New York (OANY) meetings and exchange ideas with your peers. I am sure that we would all benefit from this meeting of the minds.

Enough for this time. Hope to see you soon.
